

It is a crime story in English. Angela Samota, a student studying at a university in Texas, was raped and stabbed until she died in her apartment in 1984. But her story became unexcited until one of her friend and roommate named Sheila Wesuke decided that she wanted to know the truth. So she suggested doing an analysis of the DNA samples. Knowing that there is a blood and semen sample from Samota's crime scene, the girl called the police, and asked them to reconsider her friend's crime. She didn't get to anything so she decided to get a license so she could access her friend's samples herself. In 2006, the police are finally persuaded to reopen the case. It took two years to check the DNA, but in the end, he matched up with Donald Pace, the rapist who was convicted and sentenced to death. And this girl now works as a detective
